The Art and Sport of Contact Improvisation

Contact Improvisation (CI) can be practiced as dance, martial art, therapy, sport, or spiritual practice, depending on the intention of the players and what they desire from the practice. In this workshop we will access and develop tools to embody the physicality of the sport of CI, and the creativity in the art of CI, integrating these aspects towards an understanding of what CI is for us.

Ray Chung is a performer, teacher, engineer, and artist who has a passion for dancing which he likes to share with other people. His main focus is improvisation and he has worked with Contact Improvisation since 1979 as part of improvisational performance practice.

Sensation and Design: Dance Making in Performance

Using Contact Improvisation first as a warm up we will then notice and avoid contact partnering patterns to explore other aspects of moving in our sensory bodies—including space, composition, stillness, sensing and relationship to others/environment. With a performance mind towards creating dances in space, we will explore our actions as communication with our collaborators, audience and world at large.

Karen's 34-year dance and performance practice has been directly influenced by Steve Paxton, Nancy Stark Smith and Lisa Nelson and their respective work in Contact Improvisation, Material for the Spine and Tuning Scores, and through collaboration with many others in venues around the world. She co-founded the Breitenbush Jam, Dance Ability, Image Lab, Diverse Dance, among other projects.
